

JAMES HORNE

The Chaos of the Unknown District

The term district is often used to describe an area which has things inside of it with similar topography. However, some forget about the other side of the district walls. In a town, we often find fenced-off neighbourhoods or edges bricked up with concrete. And in between them, is simply left as the unknown. However, the unknown is the best part. The overgrown. The mess. The beauty.

Nature roams free in these 'in-between-districts', forming their own natural beautiful contrast.

I've edited these photos to have a nostalgic feel, emphasising the natural colours to show the overpowering force of nature in these upcoming summer months. From the editing you can clearly see the border which starts the surrounding districts but also how we've destroyed the original district of the plain thriving land.

© James Horne

1st June 2023